Subject III /Subgenre: The Effulgent down-side to Retrogression

Pre-Face: Wholliyism or Wholly-ism is an ideology centered around completeness and the urge to accomplish " human complete-ness without losing individuality " One's hunger and desire to be perfect or held together through transcendence, by image of self or others view without exception nor limitation to one's standard, boundaries, or moral compass. I decided to make this philosophical idea because it has become more common to lose footing in today's society by rigorous distractions that cause what I call a "Self Disconfiguration" where the person struggles to find self because too many things have split their world or wanting a better world than what the self has created. Social media does a great job at this because of the "better lifestyle view" it provides to its viewers to make one's life seem meaningless or less than. Wholliyism breaks down these social issues well by getting deeper into the human illusion of being a complete person, the possibility of transcendence, decay hidden behind progress, and interosculating conformity with non conformity to create one's transcendence. I want to say this can be looked at as an act of past self evaluation, as finding myself running into these problems throughout my life especially throughout my teenage years where I developed the "Fragmented face" view.

Subject I:

What is completeness?

Achievable through self trust but casted out through self doubt, lack of self exploration, and sometimes the mask itself . The self has to stay connected internally and not bounded by anything externally, relationships of any kind and anything that is socially constructed can be something the self par-takes in but not bounded by any result hence The self will not be affected by the external world but using it only as a growth tool achieving a alpas. This allows the self to truly indulge in the world even if it's something bad or good without taking anything personally, symbolically nirvana on earth without the self fading in oblivion and allowing the self to live frolically just like what I call the "intelligent fool who chooses to Lack of." The fool who understands the outer world and has connected with himself internally but chooses to act and to mimic the true inability of knowledge which is just pretending to be stupid through ignorance of choice, the fool understands knowledge can become a prison of its own.

Self Dis-configuration

fracture in one's world as in result this will cause the pursuit of happiness and the pursuit of one's true self image which will remain lost if one doesn't realize the external world has nothing to do with completeness but can only distract you. causing self questioning, isolation, lack of self exploration, and even the worst of them all "a person who hates all of themselves including the world that their current self has built". This triggers one of my favorite questions " can one become whole without losing individuality"this question places the self in a state where it is overwhelmingly confused about identity and a sense of belonging creating multiple fractions where different versions of the self can coexist,while some occupy reality and the others remain hidden in the multi-layered structure of the self.

Completeness Through Self-Integrated Fragmentation

Completeness can come from a series of fragmentation of the self by accepting these fragments of yourself, you're allowing all of which yourself has created and curated throughout time to exist in occupy a space as a unison. Fragmentation is caused when people refuse to accept other sides of them whether it's morally good or bad, destructive or highly praised; this creates an orphic examination of "Cognitive chaos complex" .

Cognitive Chaos Examination

This is where a person becomes enslaved in confusion and unmanaged inputs, as I like to put it someone who is stuck in a bind between the land of possibility and their own illusions causing multiple fractures in one's mental state pushing the mind to cluster its thoughts and become in a "free falling state" that can make the self a liability. The self will retract back into the unknown while one is stuck in physical and the external causing an identity crisis, Existential crisis, and at times can cause a situational crisis which mostly appears at high intensity. Meaningless interactions can further push this upon the mental state since most interactions will be seen as meaningless or no purpose because there is no inner value, the unknown placement that the self sits in is self-disconfiguration where even the world around the self becomes very shallow introducing the intensity of existential crisis which merely nobody has truly seen besides those who unfortunately not here anymore because of it. This conceptual hierarchy is the level before someone has reached "Completeness" Justin M. - Fragmentation is truly just an acceptance of not being whole which allows one to start the process of interosculating all of themselves to become a unison.

*Wholly*ism (or Wholly-ism)

Wholly-ism (or Wholly-ism)

Subject II:

Non-conformity's super power

Non-conformity is the catalyst for individuality the self can explore without shame, guilt, or judgment from others, creating a self that has the ability to avoid the paradox of conformity and the obligations of everyone's moral standards. The ability holds such puissant giving the self a uniqueness that carries an essence of its own identity; breaking the chance of getting trapped within the paradox.

Paradox of conformity

I like to call this "The ouroboros of conformity"; the self constantly devours itself in the masses and forgets individuality as it now thinks as a collective emerging from popular opinions and social perspectives losing a chance to integrate through fragmentation. The self is no longer fragmented but a wall that everyone is a part of with the common standards and characteristics that strongly dislikes non-conformity and will be quick to judge or deconstruct anyone or anything that seems to challenge conformity. From this paradox emerges two of my favorite questions: " if a person rejects moral standards what prevents them from becoming destructive" and " can individuality and collective co-exist."

The ouroboros of non conformity

Without balance of individuality and collective can create a cycle of self-centered destruction, like a cover over the eyes of the self that walks on a path alone but in reality is still with the collective. Consumed by a false uniqueness of social construct rejection the self can not fathom its conditions but rather make an illusion of individuality without truly exploring the self. It is like if a person takes a mirror and points at the sky instead of themselves and says they "found themselves" even though the sky is just a reflection of the self made from rejection of the social constructs.

Batman's covers complex

Whollyism (or Wholly-ism)

The true self against the silhouette with no separation just layers of covers that all contradict each other. The self constantly makes masks of itself to cope with the inability of its condition that the self has completely lost its identity and the purpose for it, each mask represents different views the identity carries to make itself strong but forgets why it makes it strong and ends up turning against each other. Each mask has its own set of tools that eventually become its own master that fights against its creator after seeking more power behind the creator.

Subject III:

Inglenook in wilderness harmony

Sometimes staying in original fragmentation causes fulfillment as the soul is in constant search of, realizing the true ebullience for them is the different lifestyle and environment that they can experience since the self is exploring using the external world for assistance. Creating love from the process instead of pursuing completeness, allowing one to enjoy with a balance of individuality and collective. I like to equivaluate the “fool with good decisions” to this as becoming a collective is by accident while individuality happens purposefully through the process of search. Justin Meighan - “Beauty with the self results in frolic-ness, truly fulfilled by the journey of, not the stability of unison.”

The reversal of completeness

Completeness at its purest allows one to reverse with control to find various parts of themselves that developed over time on the path “Completeness” which will allow the self to do more self exploration and what I like calling the “passive ability to gain intellect”. The passive ability to gain intellect allows one to indulge in an intuitive state of intellect about the self and various subjects about life, no longer defending masks and illusions freeing the self and allowing navigation to avoid feeling such intense limitation. Like a spirit that learned it could fly between reality and fantasy with such control, seeing different aspects of the self and life even about the unison allowing them to equally get to know its parts.

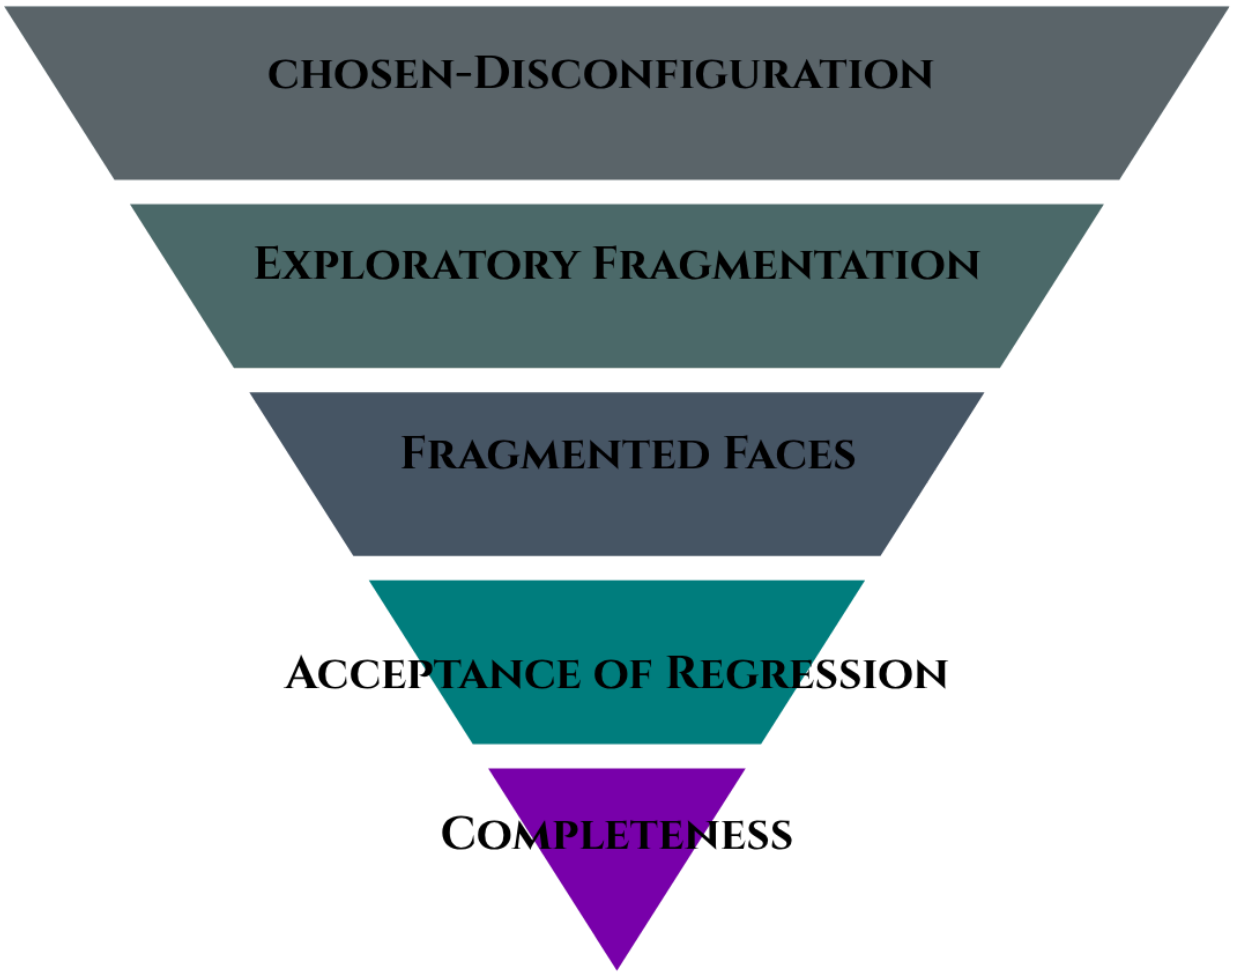
The Travel back fragmentation

Fragmentation holds a special space after the ”*The reversal of completeness”, once the ability to be between reality and fantasy because this is where you find the masks roaming with no control nor purpose. Invention of its skills come from realizing that it is currently roaming with nothing and no space to occupy, in some cases the mask just joins another one. Finding fragments lost is like finding a dollar blowing in the wind and the person decides whether it is worth it.

Fragmented faces

Before the acceptence of wholeness is this stage of where many masks create their uniqueness letting each find a realm to occupy between fantasy and reality, masks separating to have differences of mastery for different aspects. The self is allowed to see the process ongoing with no control but to observe the masks from the inside perform its “ Dance with the soul” while simultaneously competing and connecting with each other right before becoming one.

Whollyism (or Wholly-ism)



Justin Meighan - " Freedom is something achieved from the inside, options to explore even if your re-walking the same path"
